FROM OUR LEADERSHIP

The American India Foundation (AIF) has a bold purpose: to defeat poverty in India through strategically mobilizing philanthropic talent and wealth in the United States and in India. We do this by drawing the world's two largest democracies closer together and providing a model of how civil society collaboration can lead to pragmatic solutions for critical issues.

This work would be impossible without the generous support of our thousands of financial supporters and volunteers in both countries. We are grateful for each and every one of them.

AIF uses its resources to design and scale public private partnerships that accomplish what no individual actor could accomplish alone. For example, our flagship public health program, MANSI, constitutes an alliance between four state governments; SEARCH, a respected Indian NGO; Tata Steel Rural Development Society; AIF, and other allies. We carefully documented the impact of our five-year pilot and among the findings was the revelation that neonatal mortality decreased an astonishing 46% due to our comprehensive support of local community health workers.

Now we are taking concrete steps to expand MANSI nationwide in order to make a wider impact in the harrowing statistics related to maternal and child health among India's poor—where individual lives lost result not only in heartbreak but also many negative impacts on families and communities. Together, we are turning this situation around.

Another way we create impact at scale is through the leverage we achieve through strategic deployment of our philanthropic assets. One example is the Learning and Migration Program (LAMP), which is designed to ensure quality education for children in families that migrate in search of work for months at a time. In the state of Odisha, the government has institutionalized a seasonal hostel program that AIF helped design, and spends about $1 million annually to manage it. AIF invests 5% of this cost to provide supervision, quality control, and capacity building of local stakeholders—who will be positioned to manage hostels independently in the long-term. Twenty times leverage is impressive. We aspire to multiply our donations in everything we do.

We believe in public private partnerships because no organization, not even AIF, can afford to go it alone anymore. We are committed to playing our part in the larger community and movement that we have joined and indeed, that we helped create when our founders responded in a visionary way to the Gujarat earthquake in 2001.

In this report, you will read about the progress we achieved during the 2016-2017 fiscal year across these programs and our other initiatives in education and livelihoods, such as the Rickshaw Sangh, our financial inclusion initiative that has transformed 100,000 rickshaw pullers into rickshaw owners (in many cases leading to an immediate doubling of their income).

Our Clinton Fellowship Program sent 30 more idealistic and talented young people to serve for 10 months in some of the leading NGOs and social enterprises in India, bringing the cumulative number of Fellows to more than 400. According to multiple surveys of our alumni, their impact on our mission continues far beyond the intensive work they undertake while on the ground. For example, 70% of fellowship alumni surveyed in 2017 have chosen careers related to public service.

We value each and every contribution in support of our bold mission and our ever-evolving track record and strategy. We welcome all efforts to advance our mission to end poverty in India, and invite all those who have joined us on the journey to continue with us until the work is complete.

Sincerely,

ABILITY BASED LIVELIHOOD EMPOWERMENT (ABLE)

“As I watched him grow, I wondered how society would accept him. I did whatever I could to make sure he completed his schooling. Employers would hesitate to hire him, merely by looking at his disability.”

“I set up a small shop, thinking that perhaps this might be the support he needs to keep him going,” Suman says of her 24 year-old son, Dinesh Gavit. Theirs is a two-room structure with an asbestos roof, located in Mumbai’s beleaguered green lung, Aarey Colony comprising of grassland, cattle sheds, tribal villages and slums. Dinesh’s family are original inhabitants who have been farming a small land holding for their livelihood. Since he is physically challenged, Dinesh’s parents knew that his disability would not permit him to continue with farming and were anxious about his livelihood prospects.

People with disabilities (PwDs) are subject to multiple deprivations. They are more likely to be out of school. They have much lower employment rates (and the gap is growing). They are subject to strong social stigma within the community, which often becomes internalized. In India, there are approximately 27 million PwDs. Decent work is the best path to self-advancement of PwDs. It underpins the stability of communities and families, and is an integral component of strategies for sustainable growth and development. Skills development thus holds a key to inclusive employment.

AIF’s Ability Based Livelihood Empowerment program (ABLE) is building solid bridges between the world of work and skills training providers specializing in PwDs in order to match skill sets to the needs of enterprises. ABLE leads sustained dialogue between employers, trainers, government institutions, and employment services in an advocacy effort to promote inclusivity at the workplace, thereby opening more job opportunities for PwDs.

In summer, when the temperatures outside are soaring, the asbestos roofing in Dinesh’s home does nothing to ease his living conditions. Surprisingly, he is unfazed by it and gets ready for his work day. Dinesh is a social media and digital marketing assistant with Big Brand Box, an online platform that deals in home products. “I wanted to become an engineer, but we did not have the financial resources for it. So I did the next best thing, which was to pick up computer skills”, he says. Through the ABLE program, Dinesh received training in English, computers, retail, life skills and grooming. During job placement efforts, Big Brand Box selected Dinesh to handle their online order fulfilment, customer inquiries and support. His employer, Priyesh Shah, says, “We recognise that we have a role to play in fostering change within the environment that we are a part of. What sets him apart is that Dinesh values the position that he has been given and does not take things for granted.” Now, Dinesh’s mother, Suman Gavit, no longer worries about what the future looks like for her son.
Annika Gage was one of thirty young professionals selected to join the 2016-17 cohort of AIF Clinton Fellows. At the heart of the Fellowship program is a simple, bold idea: to identify, assign projects, sustain, and connect the next generation of emerging young leaders who are serving the marginalized and under-resourced geographies in India. Every year, a group of thirty young professionals from India and the US form the cohort, made up of diverse, passionate individuals who, through their own experiences and values, have demonstrated a desire to be involved in projects for social change. AIF supports their project work over a period of ten months through meet-ups, workshops, mentorship, educational tours and exposure visits, thereby enriching the Fellowship experience.

Born and raised in Ann Arbor, Michigan, 23 year-old Annika Gage chose to serve 10 months with the AIF Clinton Fellowship program in India after completing her Bachelor’s degree in Urban Studies and Health. “While most fellowship opportunities offer work in research, teaching, and academia, the AIF Fellowship had one component that the others didn’t—service! Once the initial excitement over my acceptance had faded, I prepared myself for challenges and the idea of mentorship was encouraging,” she says.

Equipped with some knowledge of Hindi, Annika demonstrated her commitment to social change, working with the community in rural Sawai Madhopur, Rajasthan. Her focus was a state-wide survey in partnership with government schools. Going from school to school, armed with a health toolkit, Annika collected data on children’s height, weight, upper arm circumference, haemoglobin levels and a survey via tablets on eating habits, hygiene and health of children. “Data collection can sometimes feel like you’re not doing anything. It’s often tedious and the results are not obvious in the short run,” she says. This data was used to create a toolkit that teachers would use to impart nutrition education in the classroom.

As more and more research now points to the importance of nutrition and health in the academic performance in young children, this project spurred Annika into designing another one that would reach out to young and adolescent girls, a population that is vulnerable to malnutrition and anaemia. The onus of ensuring that children get a well-rounded diet lies squarely with the mothers, and since most mothers work in fields during the day, Annika quickly realized that her chances of interacting with mothers would be either before or after they returned from their fields, presenting challenges of a different kind. “I was used to a nine-to-five work culture and had to suddenly switch over to a different set of timings to be able to talk to mothers. Public health tends to revolve mostly around food security and scarcity, but I wanted to go beyond that into finding out why people eat what they eat,” she adds.

Describing her Fellowship, Annika says, “I’ve been able to build relationships with the community that I think will last well beyond the duration of the fellowship. Mothers welcomed me into their lives and homes, and I am deeply grateful for that experience.” She has also developed close bonds with other Fellows in the cohort. “From the very beginning of this Fellowship, we were committed to a sense of vulnerability, taking the Fellowship seriously, and showing up for one another. The other Fellows have meant much to me and I am taking each of their voices, this form of community with me. I have been able to grow individually too, within a community of Fellows,” she says. After the Fellowship, Annika will continue to pursue her work in the health sector in India.
In her classroom, twelve-year-old Ananya Mohapatra is testing the electrical property of metal, paper, wood and plastic. “The LED lights up when there’s current passing through,” Ananya says, thrilled that she can detect a conductor of electricity.

Her teacher, Manoj Ranjan Dash, has just demonstrated how to use an insulator-conductor to explore electricity passing through objects. He says, “Two years ago we were introduced to Digital Equalizer. One of the methodologies we were exposed to, Flipped Classroom, helped me to improve my pedagogic skills. It also helps students to develop their conceptual clarity and triggers critical thinking and problem solving ability in them.”

India has around 250 million children in school where technology is rapidly integrating into classroom learning. Teaching and learning are best thought of, not as separate and independent activities, but rather as two sides of the same coin, interconnected and interrelated. Based on this principle, AIF’s Digital Equalizer program introduces pedagogical techniques such as “flipping the classroom” in which students are actively engaged in reading up their study material outside of the classroom and spending their time in active learning during class. This allows teachers to use their classroom time more effectively, by focusing on more challenging aspects of the topic or group activities that promote the development of creativity in students.

Ananya’s home has three generations of strong women: a grandmother, who barely got through middle school, and Ananya’s mother, who had a better chance at education but no exposure to the world of computers. Both of them marvel at Ananya’s dexterity at navigating her way on a laptop. The Digital Equalizer has provided her the opportunity to explore digital resources in math, science and social studies. The program begins by equipping each school with a computer center, providing an educational laboratory to enhance student learning. Targeting secondary students in grades 6-10, the program primarily trains educators in basic computer literacy, internet research and teaching methodologies that together bring creativity, diversity, and real-life examples into school curriculum through the use of technology.

Digital Equalizer schools have demonstrated increased student motivation and improved learning outcomes. Students engage in technology-supported collaborative activities with other students in the classroom. Teachers display curriculum-related resources such as videos and simulations to their classes. Last year, Digital Equalizer pioneered the broadcast of financial literacy modules through the satellite EDUSAT hub directly to Receive-only-Terminals (RoTs) in schools, combining video content with teacher development, significantly impacting students’ inferential and creative thinking skills.

Ananya enjoys exploring digital content in math and science, but it is in social studies that her interest has shown a radical improvement with higher class participation and better performance. “I want to be a doctor when I grow up and serve my village,” she says, a sentiment that is strongly supported by both her mother and her grandmother.
LEARNING AND MIGRATION PROGRAM (LAMP)

Every November, for the last three years, 12-year-old Subham Deep has cried as he hugged his parents in a routine practice of bidding them goodbye. They migrate from their village in Nuapada, Odisha in search of seasonal work, leaving behind Subham and his elder brother.

His parents will return to the village in April, before the next monsoon. Once the rains are over, they will again prepare to leave their village. It is estimated that around six million school-aged children in India participate in family-based labor migration every year. Children accompany their parents, and as a result school drop-out rates rise.

Migrant children face a life of hardship and insecurity. LAMP addresses the vulnerabilities of such children by providing them a safety net of source-based interventions, thereby ensuring that they get a fair chance at completing their school education. Children pick up basic literacy and numeracy skills as well as life skills in Learning Resource Centres run by LAMP. As a community-based program, LAMP has now expanded its focus towards working with school management committees for effective implementation of the national Right to Education (RTE) Act, in order to improve the quality of education inside the government school system.

This year, an innovative life-skills initiative of cultivating kitchen gardens in more than a hundred schools has increased retention rates, as children now have nutritious meals made from chemical-free vegetables. When a bell announces break-time between classes in the morning session, Subham and his friends rush enthusiastically to the vegetable garden to select tomatoes, runner beans, and eggplants that will be used for preparing their midday meal. The hostel caretaker, Bhagta Bandhuvad, says, “The students have total ownership of the garden here and are really motivated to water the plants. They take immense pride in their kitchen garden.”

Subham doesn’t like the idea of living apart from his parents, but insists he is not interested in migrating with them. “I want to finish my studies and become a teacher,” he says wistfully, “and once I start earning, I hope my parents will not have to leave our home again.” LAMP’s interventions protect children from the greatest risks of migration to ensure that no family is forced to remove their children from school due to migratory pressures.

This might have been Subham's fate too, had it not been for his enrolment in Behruamunda seasonal hostel as part of AIF's Learning and Migration program (LAMP). The idea is simple but effective: children, who would otherwise be forced to migrate with their parents, stay in the hostel for the migration period. They are provided caretakers, meals, and basic supplies. Children in the program stay within the safety of their own village and benefit from the positive environment where they can focus on their studies.
GARWARE INSTITUTE OF CAREER EDUCATION AND DEVELOPMENT

Certificate

This certificate is awarded to

Mr./Ms./Mrs. Komal Dilip Ghag

on successful completion of Stores Ops Assistant Course on 18th May, 2017.
MARKET ALIGNED SKILLS TRAINING (MAST)

Twenty-year-old Komal Ghag is the eldest of four siblings. After finishing high school, Komal took up a job, not to build her career, but to help support her family overcome financial difficulties.

A couple of years into the job, she felt left out by her friends who had continued their education and were on their way to getting a degree. Komal enrolled in AIF’s Market Aligned Skills Training (MAST) program at Mumbai University and completed a six-month course in retail management, arming herself with skills needed for the modern economy.

By 2020, India will be home to 700 million people of working age like Komal, a harbinger of great demographic change that, if leveraged properly, has the potential transform the country into an economic power. Faster, more inclusive and sustainable growth can only be made possible by a highly skilled workforce. Skills development is more critical than ever. AIF’s MAST program provides underprivileged youth with skills training and access to formal employment opportunities to help India seize the opportunity for inclusive growth. Having trained more than 100,000 young people for more than a decade, AIF has begun expanding and extending its model beyond the non-profit sector, starting with a new partnership with Mumbai University’s Garware Institute of Career Education and Development (GICED) to impart skills training to youth. India’s unique demographic characteristics demands that a customized solution be devised—to ensure that skills development systems deliver both the quantity and the quality of training needed. The MAST project at Mumbai University is proving that connecting basic education to skills training, skills training to labor market entry, and labor market entry to workplace is a successful model.

At Mumbai University, recruiters from leading retail chains and the hospitality industry conducted campus interviews at a job fair organized by the MAST program team. Beaming with confidence and joy, Komal announced that she had excelled in the interview and received a job offer from a national clothing retail chain. “After dropping out, I thought it would take me another three years to acquire a degree and put me on par with my friends, but the skills I picked up through MAST helped me to get this job and in a much shorter time. I’m looking forward to a career in retail,” she says.

The MAST program gives hope to people like Komal, helping them to build their foundation skills and gain important workplace skills for a successful transition from school to work. Soon to be home to one-fifth of the world’s working-age population, India’s path to becoming a high performance nation is certainly going to be shaped by its ability, at scale, to impart market-relevant skills to its youth and MAST is helping to close the gap.
MATERNAL AND NEWBORN SURVIVAL INITIATIVE (MANSI)

Mansa Devi of Himrol village in Uttarakhand is eight months pregnant. She is attended to by Usha Rana, who has ensured that Mansa receives timely antenatal tetanus shots and takes her iron supplements regularly.

Usha Rana is an accredited social health activist (ASHA). As a community health worker, she represents a health workforce that holds within its hands the ability to improve the health and well-being of mothers, babies and families across the country.

Beaming with happiness, Mansa says, “One thing I have learnt from Usha Didi is to have a balanced diet. This time, I am feeling better. We have registered ourselves at the health centre and will go there for my delivery.” Mansa’s mother-in-law is a Dai (village midwife) and had assisted Mansa in the delivery of her first two children, both of which were difficult. But after regular home visits by community health worker Usha Didi, Mansa is convinced that an institutional delivery is the safest way to have her third child.

Home to more than ten million people, the state of Uttarakhand faces significant maternal and newborn healthcare challenges. Its remote landscape creates a major challenge to access for emergency care in rural areas of Uttarakhand. The majority of families living in this mountainous area are far away from the nearest primary health center and even farther away from the community health center. Long distances and poor road conditions make it difficult for villagers to travel to health centers, thereby limiting their access to care.

AIF’s Maternal and Newborn Survival Initiative (MANSI) is saving the lives of mothers and babies in remote areas of India. Empirical evidence demonstrates that a set of low-cost essential interventions can prevent the majority of maternal and newborn deaths, from routine antenatal care (ANC) and clean delivery to exclusive breastfeeding. MANSI successfully delivers this through a public-private partnership model that is focused on the training and capacity building of ASHAs.

“Every morning, what pulls me back to work, is the woman who is pregnant. I want to help her bring a new life into this world and put a healthy baby into her arms,” says Usha Didi, as she gets ready for the day. She begins her day by visiting pregnant and new mothers in the village to conduct check-ups. She then convenes a community meeting, to engage and educate women, men and village elders on the importance of safe pregnancies and deliveries. ASHA workers are part of a larger change occurring in India to improve maternal and newborn health. In many parts of India, Usha and community health workers like her, are often the first and only link that women and children have to basic healthcare. MANSI is leading a determined effort to train and support thousands of Usha Didis to catapult India’s healthcare agenda to success.
I come from Dogachiya, a village on the outskirts of Kolkata. Even though I’m 42 now, all I can remember is pulling a rickshaw. Since I wasn’t interested in going to school, my father thought I may as well contribute to the family income. Ours was a large family.

I slogged ten to twelve hours a day as a rickshaw puller. Though the rickshaw helped me earn my livelihood, I was in an exploitative system where I had no security and if a passenger refused to pay for a ride, there was nothing I could do. Moreover, I didn’t own my rickshaw. I hired it for 30 rupees [50 cents] a day and returned it to the owner at night.”

Dissatisfied with the daily plight of passenger harassment, low and irregular pay—leading to an inability to build any savings—Kayem Ali and his wife Arjina Bibi approached the rickshaw collective in their community to explore how they could purchase their own rickshaw. AIF’s Rickshaw Sangh offered them a combination of asset ownership and access to social services. They are joint borrowers of the rickshaw, and are repaying the loan taken to purchase it. Kayem uses his rickshaw to transport farm produce to the market such as mangoes, areca nuts, coconuts, vegetables and chickens. They marvel at how this simple decision transformed their lives from a daily struggle for survival to being able to build up some savings and send their children to school.

AIF’s Rickshaw Sangh program has modernized the rickshaw sector by bringing dignity to the lives of rickshaw pullers. Rickshaw Sangh secures an identity for individual rickshaw drivers through key social benefits—including an identity card, driver’s license, permit and uniform—and in turn mobilizes drivers into collectives and links them to commercial credit facilities to access formal credit and thus entry into the formal financial sector. Rickshaw collectives take joint responsibility for a group of loans, guaranteed by AIF, for which they can own their own vehicles through easy weekly repayments over a period of one year.

Kayem Ali is a happy man now. He says, “I cover a ten kilometer radius. My income has risen manifold, since the rickshaw is mine and I can ride it for as many hours in a day without having to worry about paying rent or exceeding the rental hours.” Arjina Bibi says this is the first asset she has ever owned in her life and it makes her feel good about herself. She wants to use the earnings from the rickshaw to save up for her daughters’ education. The eldest, Naseema, is studying in 10th Grade and wants to become a policewoman. Younger daughter Soraiya says she will be a doctor. “Let them study as much as they want,” he says, adding that he enjoys the respect he gets from his community now that he owns his own rickshaw.
